Utilizing the Freehand Drawings Interview Process

Freehand Drawing Interview Process
- Write your name?
- Draw yourself?
- Draw your family?
- Draw what happened?

- Freehand drawings help build rapport and encourage narrative accounts
- Drawings work well with children who are quiet, shy, from another culture or have speech or language difficulties

- By utilizing drawings a child can safely “project” what one thinks about himself, herself or others onto the drawn image, separating the emotional reactions from the image(s)

- The interviewer should examine the drawing, looking for things that are unusual, missing, exaggerated, heavily shaded or overemphasized through enlargement. The interviewer should then ask the child to explain that portion of the drawing
- Question – “What type of face is that?”
- Anatomical inventory

Drawing Process Interview Rules
- Don't play amateur psychologist or art therapist
- Allow the child to interpret the drawings for you – NEVER interpret the drawings yourself
- Don't ask questions about the drawing until the drawing is completed
- Last…take the pencil / crayons away when each drawing is completed
Write your Name

Draw a Picture of Yourself

Anatomical Inventory

Draw a Picture of Your Family

Draw a Picture of What Happened

“Can you show me what happened?”

Closing the Interview

- “You are not to blame and you did nothing wrong”
- Do you want to ask me anything?
- Tell the victim what will happen next
Thank you!
